orts to overreach Bulgaria. It was a detestable use of the power the Czar exercises as the head of the Russo-Orthodox Church that paved the way for his arbitrary command for the present of the military situation in Serbia. It was, indeed, an unfortunate circumstance for the Emperor that his Queen Alexandra sympathized with the Russianophile party in the Balkans. Estrangement and distrust were inevitable, but his resort to a divorce was only a blunder, but a fatality. That this would range against him a large measure of the ecclesiastical influence of his kingdom was certain, and when, by the accession of length thus brought them, the leaders of the Russianophile party vaulted into power, only choice lay between abdication and chronement. He had thus placed both ecclesiastical and popular forces of Russia at Russia's disposal; and thus he was holding now the ball in his own hands, could keep it rolling where and when he pleased.

The position which has in this way been created for Russia is unquestionably a dangerous one. It is, in short, the key to the European situation, and makes her master that for the time being. There she can intrigue without serious hindrance to the union of Serbia and Montenegro under Prince NIKITA. Rumours are already afloat that the prince has been working for some time past for the promotion of the Serbian cause, and the kidnapping of the young Prince ALEXANDER, in that arrangements are simultaneously being made for proclaiming NIKITA king in his stead. That there is no foundation for these reports there is room to doubt, and the most convincing evidence of their truth is to be found in the recommendation of Bishop MICHAEL, who has just returned from a visit to the prince, and the proposal to the inter-national party by the Russian minister at Belgrade. The former proposition is to the effect that Prince NIKITA should be proclaimed King of Serbia, inclusive of Bosnia and Herzegovina; the latter, that the Russophile party in power should aim at a re-union of all Serbian provinces. It is possible that these two propositions may denote tantially the same thing, and the suggestion of the Politische Correspondenz that Austria should checkmate Russia by calling ex-King MILAN and restoring Bosnia and Herzegovina for a money payment, would appear to support that view. On the other hand, the proposal of the Standard is certainly susceptible of a much wider application. Of the desire of the national or great party to see Serbia at the head of confederacy of the Balkan princedoms, we are of course fully aware, and the policy neutralizing this popular ambition by placing before the mind of the people the vision of coalescing all the municipalities of the old Serbian Empire under a prince assured of the Czar's goodwill, is quite in harmony with Russian bleeding diplomacy. The one scheme is, therefore, more prudent than the other is, and is the more daring. Both of them, however, point in the same direction, and the same ultimate result. For whichever of them may be adopted, either of them, if successfully executed, means not only the dismemberment of Austria, but also the exclusion of her influence from the whole of the Balkan Peninsula, while it would place Bulgaria entirely at the mercy of Russia as well as of Macedonia and Albania. No knowledge of the Russian's aim, it would only then remain for Russia to incorporate the kingdom of Roumania and march upon Constantinople at her convenience. Apparently it is the perception of this that has induced the authorities at Bukarest to make it intimated that in the event of a war between Russia and Austria, Roumania will remain neutral, and the Porte, without more provision, to declare that Turkey will assume an offensive attitude, and that the League of Nations be invaded, and the League will reinforce the garrisons on knowing that by the terms of the Triple Alliance Germany and Italy are bound to Austria only in the event of her being attacked, Russia's policy is sure to be, as a matter of fact, to abstain from overt operations and to intrigue, so as to compel that Power to commence hostilities. And these intrigues, whether caused by a resolution of the Emperor or by the intrigues of the Prince of Bismarck, or by the choice of the Emperor, or by the fanning of a revolution in Bosnia and Herzegovina, would furnish Russia with a pretext for sending her armies across the Galician frontier. In that event the fate of Austria would depend on the promptitude and effectiveness of the help she receives from Germany. And that, we are inclined to believe, Germany will now be ready to do on a decisive scale. True, it has recently been said that Germany is not

Germany born declared to be a German, has been in the Eastern question; but, exposed as it is to the hostility of two great military Powers, Germany's own salvation has become identified with the preservation of the Rumanian frontier. It may therefore be inferred that as soon as the Russian armies cross the Rumanian frontier the forces of Germany will be launched against their flank. This takes to be the import of the statement made by two of the leading German journals, that a struggle between Russia and Germany is inevitable. The adoption of such a policy at Berlin might, it is true, invite an attempt on the part of the Gallio Government to invade Germany, in the hope of recovering the provinces lost in the war of 1870-71. And such a contingency lends weight to the report that two of the Czar's generals are at present in Paris with the object of arranging political and military operation between Russia and France. This would be an imperative summons to Italy to take the field, and how far the safe would then spread, or what the end it might be, no one can venture to say. As much is certain, however, that Austria cannot be an idle spectator of events now transpiring in Servia, and that some overt action she may be forced to take there will be but the beginning of trouble.
